

Study of Empowerment of women and its various parameters

Gitesh Kalita

Research Scholar

Education Department

Usha Martin University, Ranchi, Jharkhand.

Abstract

Empowering women is an essential component in developing a society that is equitable and just. It is an idea that tries to guarantee that women have equal access to opportunities, resources, and rights; that they are able to exercise their agency; and that they are able to make choices about their life that are based on accurate and up-to-date information. The process of empowering women is intricate and multi-faceted, taking into account a wide range of social, economic, political, and cultural variables. It needs the removal of patriarchal norms and behaviour that, among other things, restrict the possibilities available to women and propagate discrimination on the basis of gender. The empowerment of women results in substantial advantages for the whole of society. Empowering women may lead to higher economic development, better health outcomes, and more effective government. Women are a tremendous resource that is underused in many communities. Empowering women can lead to increased economic growth. Women who have more agency in their lives are also more inclined to invest in their families and communities, which may have a beneficial impact, both socially and economically, on future generations.

Keywords: Women empowerment, Gender equality, Agency and autonomy, Patriarchal norms and practices, Social, economic, political, and cultural factors, Political participation

Introduction

The promotion of women's empowerment involves more than merely guaranteeing them the same rights and opportunities as men. In addition to this, it is about confronting the deeply rooted cultural and societal norms that are responsible for the perpetuation of gender-based violence and discrimination. These standards often perpetuate detrimental gender stereotypes, which in turn restrict the options available to women and strengthen patriarchal power systems. It is essential to cultivate an enabling atmosphere that encourages and sustains women's independent decision-making in order to advance the cause of women's empowerment. This includes providing access to education, healthcare, and financial resources; promoting positive representations of women in the media; and challenging harmful cultural practices such as female genital mutilation and child marriage. In addition, this includes promoting positive representations of women in the media. In order to empower women, it is necessary to overcome the structural hurdles that restrict the possibilities and rights available to them. This includes addressing gender disparities in education and employment, promoting equal pay and opportunities for career advancement, and ensuring that women have equal representation in political and decision-making processes. Other aspects of this goal include ensuring that women have equal opportunities for career advancement. The empowerment of women is a problem that affects not just women but also society as a whole. In order to combat negative gender stereotypes and advance gender equality, it is necessary for all members of society, including men and boys, to be actively involved and engaged in the process. It is only by collaborative effort that we will be able to establish a society that, regardless of gender, honors and respects the rights as well as the contributions made by all persons. It is necessary to take a comprehensive and holistic approach in order to address the social, economic, political, and cultural factors that restrict women's opportunities and rights in order to effectively empower women. This is because women's empowerment is a complicated and multi-faceted concept. We can make our society more equitable, just, and prosperous for everyone if we promote gender equality and work to increase women's economic independence. In spite of the strides that have been achieved in recent years to advance the cause of women's empowerment, many obstacles still need to be overcome. Women continue to be subjected to institutionalized forms of discrimination and violence, and the opportunities and rights available to them are often constrained by socioeconomic and cultural reasons. Women are disproportionately impacted by poverty and inequality across the globe, and gender inequities in areas such as education, employment, and political engagement continue to exist in many regions of the world.

Efforts to promote women's empowerment need to be based on a profound knowledge of the obstacles that women experience, as well as the cultural, social, and economic elements that contribute to these challenges. This understanding is essential to ensuring that the empowerment of women is successful. In order to make progress that is both steady and long-lasting toward the goal of empowering women, it is vital to use an all-encompassing strategy that targets the fundamental issues that underlie gender-based violence and discrimination. This involves making investments in education and healthcare, encouraging the involvement of women in political processes, and questioning damaging cultural practices and conventions. We can make the world a more fair and equitable place for everyone if we give women greater authority and work toward achieving gender equality.

The idea of women's empowerment has experienced a radical transformation over the course of the last half century, shifting from a welfare-oriented approach to an equity-oriented one. It has come to be defined as the process by which weak people attain a greater degree of control over the conditions of their existence. Control over one's own resources and ideas are especially important aspects of empowerment. "It leads to a rising internal potential, increased levels of self-confidence, and an inner alteration of one's awareness, which helps one to transcend external barriers. This perspective places a primary emphasis on both of these significant facets. To begin, it is a power that enables one to accomplish one's aims, but it is not a power that one has over other people. Second, the concept of empowerment is most useful for people who lack authority, regardless of whether they are male or female, a group of individuals, a class, or a caste. Even if the notion of empowerment is not limited to just women, it is still one of a kind due to the fact that it transcends all classes and castes, as well as the boundaries that exist within families and homes. A change in the circumstances of a woman's life that makes it possible for her to have a greater potential to lead a human existence that is meaningful and satisfying is another definition of women's empowerment.

Parameters for Women empowerment

Empowerment of women is a multi-faceted notion that involves a variety of social, economic, political, and cultural elements. These variables all play a role in elevating the position of women in society, as well as their rights and possibilities available to them. The fundamental goal of the movement known as women's empowerment is to provide conditions in which women may freely exercise their agency and make well-informed choices about the direction their lives should go.

- Agency and autonomy: Women empowerment seeks to promote women's agency and autonomy by providing them with the tools and resources they need to make decisions about their lives. This includes access to education, healthcare, and financial resources.
- Gender equality: Women empowerment seeks to achieve gender equality by challenging patriarchal norms and practices that limit women's opportunities and reinforce gender-based discrimination. This includes addressing gender-based violence, promoting equal pay, and ensuring equal access to education and employment opportunities.
- Political participation: Women empowerment seeks to increase women's political participation by providing them with equal opportunities to participate in decision-making processes and representation in political bodies. This includes promoting women's leadership and supporting women's political campaigns.
- Social and cultural change: Women empowerment seeks to promote social and cultural change by challenging traditional gender roles and stereotypes that limit women's opportunities and reinforce gender-based discrimination. This includes promoting positive representations of women in the media and challenging harmful cultural practices such as female genital mutilation and child marriage.

Women empowerment is a movement towards the achievement of gender equality, a society where women and men have equal opportunities, rights, and access to resources. It is a concept that aims to break the systemic barriers that prevent women from exercising their full potential, including social, economic, and cultural factors that limit their participation in decision-making processes and their ability to realize their full potential. Women's empowerment is a complex and multi-dimensional concept that involves various factors such as education, health, economic, and political participation. At its core, women's empowerment is about promoting women's agency and autonomy, providing them with the necessary resources and tools to make informed decisions about their lives, and challenging the patriarchal norms and practices that limit their opportunities. The empowerment of women has far-reaching benefits for society, from reducing poverty and promoting economic growth to improving health outcomes and fostering more effective governance.

Efforts to promote women's empowerment require a comprehensive and holistic approach that addresses the root causes of gender-based discrimination and violence. This includes challenging harmful cultural practices and norms, investing in education and healthcare, promoting women's political participation, and ensuring equal representation in decision-making processes. achieving women's empowerment is not only a matter of women's rights but also a societal issue”. It requires the involvement and engagement of all members of society, including men and boys, to challenge harmful gender norms and promote gender equality. It is only by working together that we can create a fairer, more just, and more prosperous society for all.

Review of literature

(Nayak and Mahanta 2011) studied Women Empowerment in India found that, and an effort to examine the state of women's empowerment in India using multiple indicators based on data from secondary sources; found that, and an attempt to analyse the status of women's empowerment in India; both found that. According to the findings of the research, women in India have substantially less authority than males, and their social standing is often seen to be below that of men, in spite of the various initiatives launched by the Indian government. There is a disparity between the sexes in terms of education and career opportunities. Women's freedom of movement and authority to make decisions inside the household are significantly impacted by factors such as their age, education level, and work situation. It has been discovered that the acceptance of uneven gender norms by members of the female population is still prevalent in society. More over half of all women feel that there are circumstances in which it is acceptable to physically abuse one's wife. “There are fewer women who have the ultimate decision on how their money should be spent. Control over monetary earnings is positively correlated with factors such as age, level of education, and location. The amount of time women spend consuming media is likewise much lower in comparison to males. Women who live in rural areas have a higher risk of experiencing domestic abuse compared to women who live in metropolitan areas. There is also a significant gender disparity in terms of political engagement. The conclusion of the study is an observation that having access to education and employment are only two of the factors that enable one to become more empowered. However, the degree to which one is successful in working toward the goal of gender equality is highly dependent on the attitudes of individuals.

(Esther Duflo 2010 2011) studied women’s empowerment and economic development discovered that economic growth and the empowerment of women are intricately connected to one another. Empowering women will bring about changes in decision-making, which will have a direct influence on development. While development itself will bring about women's empowerment, women's empowerment will bring about changes in decision-making. Women's empowerment and development will mutually reinforce each other, and eventually women will be equal partners in richer societies. However, contrary to what is claimed by some of the more optimistic policy makers, it is not clear that a one-time impulsion of women's rights will spark a virtuous circle. This is because it is not clear that a one-time impulsion of women's rights will spark a virtuous circle. One the one hand, economic development by itself is insufficient to ensure significant progress in important dimensions of women's empowerment. In particular, significant progress in women's ability to make decisions in the face of pervasive stereotypes against women's ability is required to ensure that women are able to make significant strides toward empowerment. On the other hand, the empowerment of women leads to improvements in certain elements of children's welfare (particularly health and nutrition), but these improvements come at the price of improvements in some other aspects (education).

(Shettar 2015) studied A Study on Issues and Challenges of Women Empowerment in India discovered that, and aims to examine the situation of women's empowerment in India, as well as highlighting the issues and challenges associated with women's empowerment. The advancement of women's rights as a social movement has emerged as one of the most pressing issues of the 21st century. However, women's empowerment is still just a theoretical concept in the actual world. We see women fall prey to a variety of societal ills on a regular basis, and this is something that we are aware of. Women's empowerment is an essential tool for increasing women's access to resources and enabling them to make more informed decisions about their lives. The process of elevating the economic, social, and political standing of women, who have historically been the most disadvantaged members of society, is at the heart of what we mean when we talk about the empowerment of women. It is the process of protecting kids against any and all sorts of physical aggression. The research relies entirely on secondary sources for its findings. According to the findings of the research, women in India have substantially less authority than males, and their social standing is often seen to be below that of men, in spite of the various initiatives launched by the Indian government. It has been discovered that the acceptance of uneven gender norms by members of the female population is still prevalent in society. The conclusion of the research is an observation that access to Education and Employment, as well as Change in Social Structure, are the only elements that enable women to become more empowered.

(Lecturer and Mahavidyalaya 2018) studied a study on women empowerment in 21st century discovered this and The topic of women's empowerment in the 21st century is the focus of the current research. This research will investigate the education of women in pre-colonial, colonial, and modern India, the various forms of empowerment for women, the violence against women, women's rights, the legal protection of women in the Indian constitution, the role of non-governmental organisations (NGOs) in women's empowerment, the Government's schemes and programmes for women's empowerment, how education has contributed to woman empowerment, and how Indian society is changing as a result of women's empowerment in the 21st century. As a consequence of this, it has been noticed that the historical context of women's education in Indian culture during the Vedic period was favorable for women's education. According to the findings of this research, the term women empowerment refers to the process of expanding and enhancing the social, economic, political, and legal strength of women, with the goals of ensuring that women have equal rights and giving them the confidence to assert those rights". The empowerment of a nation's female population is necessary for the country as a whole to make progress. In addition to that, this research demonstrates the rights guaranteed to women by the Constitution, as well as the benefits offered by a variety of NGOs, governmental agencies, and other organisations. Education for women is essential to reviving the concept of woman empowerment. Education will provide the women a heightened sense of self-awareness on the social, political, and economic fronts. The results of this research indicate that the empowerment of women is contributing to the development and transformation of Indian society in the 21st century.

Conclusion

The emancipation of women is an essential component in building a society that is equitable and just. It is a movement with the goal of ensuring that women have equal access to rights, opportunities, and resources; that they are able to exercise their agency; and that they are able to make choices about their life that are based on accurate information. To achieve gender equality and the empowerment of women, it is necessary to question the deeply ingrained cultural and social norms that contribute to the perpetuation of gender-based discrimination and violence, as well as to address the structural barriers that limit women's opportunities and rights. The empowerment of women results in substantial advantages for the whole of society. It has the potential to result in higher rates of economic development, better health outcomes, and more efficient government. Women who have more agency in their lives are also more inclined to invest in their families and communities, which may have a beneficial impact, both socially and economically, on future generations. In spite of the strides that have been achieved, there are still a lot of obstacles to overcome in the fight to empower women. Women continue to be subjected to institutionalised forms of discrimination and violence, and the opportunities and rights available to them are often constrained by socioeconomic and cultural reasons. For women's empowerment to be achieved, a strategy that is both complete and holistic is required. This approach must target the underlying factors that contribute to gender-based discrimination and violence, and it must entail the participation and participation of all members of society. In the end, the empowerment of women is not simply a question of women's rights, but also a problem that pertains to society as a whole. For there to be a society that is more equitable, more just, and more affluent for everyone, there has to be a concerted effort on the part of all people, organisations, and institutions. We can only accomplish women's empowerment and establish a brighter future for everyone if we work together, challenge harmful gender norms, and promote gender equality. This requires us to challenge harmful gender norms.

References

1. The Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action. United Nations.
<https://www.un.org/womenwatch/daw/beijing/platform/>
2. The Power of Women's Empowerment. World Bank.
<https://www.worldbank.org/en/topic/gender/brief/womens-empowerment>
3. Empowering Women: Four Theories Tested on Four Different Aspects of Gender Equality. World Development.
<https://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0305750X16304230>

4. Women's Empowerment and Economic Development. Journal of Economic Literature. <https://www.aeaweb.org/articles?id=10.1257/jel.20171159>
5. Gender Equality and Sustainable Development. United Nations Development Programme. <https://www.undp.org/content/undp/en/home/sustainable-development-goals/goal-5-gender-equality.html>
6. Measuring Women's Empowerment: Learning from Cross-National Research. Gender & Society. <https://journals.sagepub.com/doi/abs/10.1177/0891243204272785>
7. The Intersection of Women's Empowerment and Global Health. Frontiers in Public Health. <https://www.frontiersin.org/articles/10.3389/fpubh.2020.582999/full>
8. Empowering Women through Political Participation: A Comparative Analysis of Gender Quotas. Politics & Gender. <https://www.cambridge.org/core/journals/politics-and-gender/article/empowering-women-through-political-participation-a-comparative-analysis-of-gender-quotas/2D1EB52ECF5629CC80B0C8F41F469B37>
9. Women's Empowerment and Family Planning: A Review of the Literature. Journal of Biosocial Science. <https://www.cambridge.org/core/journals/journal-of-biosocial-science/article/womens-empowerment-and-family-planning-a-review-of-the-literature/6E22CA2C291F44B90B9F3D6BBD0E1557>
10. The Role of Education in Women's Empowerment: Evidence from Bangladesh. Journal of Development Economics. <https://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0304387816300426>
11. Kabeer, Naila. Empowering Women: Four Theories Tested on Four Different Aspects of Gender Equality. World Development, vol. 43, pp. 112-127, 2013. <https://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0305750X16304230>
12. Klasen, Stephan, and Francesca Lamanna. Women's Empowerment and Economic Development. Journal of Economic Literature, vol. 55, no. 4, pp. 1321-1374, 2017. <https://www.aeaweb.org/articles?id=10.1257/jel.20171159>
13. United Nations Development Programme. Gender Equality and Sustainable Development. <https://www.undp.org/content/undp/en/home/sustainable-development-goals/goal-5-gender-equality.html>
14. Malhotra, Anju, Rohini Pande, and Caren Grown. Measuring Women's Empowerment: Learning from Cross-National Research. Gender & Society, vol. 18, no. 4, pp. 510-529, 2004. <https://journals.sagepub.com/doi/abs/10.1177/0891243204272785>