The right to privacy is often secured by statutory law. For ex., The Health Information Portability & Accountability Act protects a person's health information, & the Federal Trade Commission implements the right to privacy in various privacy statements & privacy policies.

The rights to privacy should often be equalized against the state attractive interests, including encouraging public safety & improving the quality of life. Motorcycle helmet & Seat belt laws requirements are ex. of such laws & while many Americans have enough information that the government saves personal information, mostly says that government surveillance is tolerable.

Key Words : Right To Privacy, Accountability Act & Health Information Movability.

Constitutional right

The right to privacy often has the right to personal autonomy, or the right to choose whether to engage in some acts or have some experience. Many amendments in the American Constitution have been used in various degrees of success in determining the right to individual autonomy:

1. The first amendment protects the confidentiality of beliefs
2. The third amendment protects the privacy of the home against its use for the soldiers.
3. Fourth Amendment protects privacy against inappropriate searches
4. Fifth Amendment protects against self-love, which in turn protects the privacy of personal information
5. The 9th Amendment says that "the rights of certain rights made by people in the constitution of some rights will not be considered for rejecting or humiliating." It has been interpreted as justification for the widely read of the Bill of Rights, in order to protect confidentiality in ways not specifically provided in the first eight modifications.
